Text

What do you have for breakfast? Toast? Cereal? Just a cup of coffee? These days eating breakfast has become a bit of an international thing, with cereals from popular brands available all over the world. Of course, every country has its own specialities: the French have their café au lait and croissant; the Germans have their black bread and sliced ham; and the Spanish have their magdalenas and café con leche. But what about the British?

Perhaps the most famous British contribution to breakfast has been the English breakfast. Of course there are Irish and Scottish varieties too, but these breakfasts are all basically the same, and consist of the following: a pot of tea, baked beans, eggs, toast, bacon, sausages, fried bread, mushrooms, black pudding and tomatoes.

Apparently, this breakfast was invented by English aristocrats who would often eat enormous amounts of food in the morning. The idea was that they could spend the rest of the day hunting, fighting and duelling until the evening when they could eat again.

One of the key components of the English breakfast is the egg. This can come in many shapes and forms, and you'll need to know all the options so you can make the best choice. You can have your eggs fried, scrambled, poached or boiled.

Of course, not everyone in England has an English breakfast in the morning. In fact, English breakfasts are mostly eaten at the weekend or during holidays.
